

Bridging the Space: High School and College Educators Working Together

Bridging the Space is a collaboration between the Lehman College Now Program, CUNY At Home in College, and the NYC Writing Project that brings teachers from NYC public high schools and CUNY colleges together to share ideas and develop strategies that will create a continuum of developing literacy skills from high school to college. If you have an interest in establishing links with your colleagues in high school and college, read on and apply.

Each seminar meeting will focus on fundamental questions such as:

- How do we bridge the space between high school and college with the understanding that our students are shouldering this burden?
- How do we help students develop the confidence and written voice to understand and negotiate college-level texts?
- How can college faculty gain a better understanding of the expectations and rigor of high school-level courses, as well as the challenges faced by teachers and students in NYC high schools?
- How can high school faculty gain a better understanding of the expectations and rigor required for college level courses, as well as the challenges faced by teachers and students in NYC colleges?

Who is eligible to apply?

Any NYC public high school teacher in the humanities and social sciences disciplines who works at a high school affiliated with At Home in College or College Now or any CUNY college faculty member in the humanities and social sciences disciplines.

The seminars will be led by At Home in College and New York City Writing Project consultants and will meet for eight sessions on either a Wednesday or a Thursday, during spring 2013. There is also an inter-visitation requirement, which counts as the 9th session. Participants will experiment with new classroom activities, strategies and assignments and share resulting student writing; read relevant academic essays to support inquiry and discussion; visit each others' classrooms; explore ways to understand college-level texts and examine the Common Core Learning Standards (CCLS).
